Course Overview

People do not come with a manual. We only see what we want to see in a friend or colleague and rarely understand the complex emotional matrix that creates the person in front of us, we judge them by our own behavioural map. Top leaders and communicators can decipher the behavioural codes of other people and react accordingly to build effective and lasting rapport with anyone. One of the tools used is Neuro-Linguistic Programming (NLP), the science, or art of creating and recreating human excellence in all areas of communication and influence. The processes examine the effective habits of highly motivated top performers in both business and social situation, enabling them to adapt their behaviours and skills to any given situation. By examining in detail how they achieve their outcomes it is possible to reproduce and hone best practice for the good of the individual, team and organisation.

This concept has been developed over the past three decades to enable us to interpret human experiences, by understanding how people think, feel and react.

Within the business world NLP is now seen as a vital skill to improve the effectiveness and impact of communication.
